Minhajul Quran adhered to the traditional, strongly Sufi-flavoured version of Islamic belief and practice, but at the same time embraced many aspects of modernity and borrowed vocabulary, forms of organisation and patterns of social activism from reformist Muslims. Working of Minhajul Quran signifies how much diversity there is among Muslims in Europe in regard to the nature of religious practice and forms of religious devotion, and acts as a counterpoint to the predominant image of Muslims which is that migration only generates scriptural forms of religious practice. The case of Minhajul Quran in Europe demonstrates this. By focusing on the diversity of practices and the discourse of their justification, this study of Minhajul Quran demonstrates that there are different ways in which Muslims review, redefine and re-engage with their tradition. Studies on the subject of Islam in Europe should deal with the diversity of these religious engagements.
